The Huntsmen

Bappaditya Chakravarty

A race against time in a throwback to classic noir.

An explosion shatters a peaceful evening at the India Gate lawns in New Delhi.

In London, two Muslim clerics are murdered.

Police discover the tortured body of a prominent geologist in Goa.

Two women, on holiday in Mumbai, are kidnapped.

Who is the mastermind behind these seemingly unrelated incidents, and what is their ultimate agenda?

Rudra, along with Vijay, agents of an unnamed, high-risk, high-security, Indian agency, race from Mumbai to Cairo and beyond in an exhilarating hunt for truth and justice.

Will the huntsmen pin down their prey?

Or will their quest come to an explosive end?

Born in 1951, Bappaditya Chakravarty was educated at Delhi University and at the Indian Institute of Management, Calcutta. There was an aircraft parked crosswise in the middle of the road. Murtaza was a middle-aged man. A family man with three sons. He was no racing driver and did not have those kinds of reflexes. Consequently, the van went completely out of control, ran on for a few meters, and then stalled. He was about to open the door after taking off the safety belt when the cold muzzle of a gun touched his temple. The man's face was covered. In a deep voice, the man said, 'Don't mind, dost, I need your car for the night. You can use my plane if you want.' And then everything went dark.
